2016 OUTDOOR LIVING

Three Asian-inspired island gardens ("Life," "Harmony" and "Serenity") are planted in drought-tolerant sedums, grasses and conifers on the site of the old driveway. A stone lantern and backdrop of Japanese maples add to the effect.

Albers grew up raising vegetables in Illinois, but he's taken to gardening here as if born to mountains, seascapes and glacial till. Undeterred by Himalayan blackberries, morning glory and Scotch broom, Albers set in to make a garden showcasing plants that adapt to Northwest conditions as readily as he has.

And what rich cultivation it is, with thousands of plants from around the globe growing harmoniously together on this Northwest hillside. "I favor plants that look compatible, as if they should be living here. I wouldn't plant a monkey tree," he says.

Albers dug out invasives by hand, creating a pile of ivy that towered 15 feet high by the time he finished. He adds compost and mulch to improve the clay soil, planting ribbons of lavender through the sandy areas of the garden. Albers constantly culls plants that don't measure up. "Ceanothus is off my list, it's too short-lived," he declares. ▶

The biofiltration garden, planted over the septic system, features shallow-rooted shrubs and perennials. Yarrow, lavender, heather, and pink spires of tree rue (Lycium x chinensis) flourish.
